THE FAST OF YOM KIPPUR

By Rabbi Ferdinand M. Isserman

"Is not this the fast that I have chosen? To loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? When thou seest the naked that thou cover him, and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh." This is Isaiah's definition of Yom Kippur. It is not a day for fasting and affliction, not a day for bowing one's head like a bulrush, nor for clothing one's self in sackcloth and ashes.

Isaiah well perceives that these are but the trappings and the suits of repentance—that men may fast and fast and fast and yet be villains; that men may beat their breasts a thousand times in contrition in the synagogue, and return to their homes with all the arrogance and with all the selfishness with which they left them twenty-four hours previously. Those have not observed the Day of Atonement even if they have not missed one syllable of the prayers and even if from sunset to sunset they deprived their bodies of their customary sustenance. For the prophet fasting alone is not enough, affliction alone is not enough. These are hollow and sham unless they are conducive to finer living. Deal thy bread to the hungry! Bring the poor to thy house! Clothe the naked when thou seest him! This is the essence of Yom Kippur. The Jew who truly wishes to observe the spirit of his most sacred day will deal his bread to the hungry. The Jew who truly yields to the imperious mandate of his faith expressed by the prophet will clothe the naked.

By our fathers this challenge of Yom Kippur was met. No matter how poor the Jew was, he never had too little to share with his less fortunate neighbour. Even in the narrow and cramped Ghetto none starved to death—because when one Jew had, all had. Before Israel had yet entered the promised land, Moses had already urged to leave the corner of the field for the poor, for the widow and the orphan. That Mosaic injunction the Jew has observed throughout the ages and whatever our detractors may say, none can ever yet said that the Jews have abandoned their needy, their sick and their feeble. The very ones who have come to claim us have frequently ended in praising us for the self-sacrificing generosity with which our charities were maintained.

The Hebrew word for charity is Zedakah. Every Jewish home had its Zedakah box. Zedakah means righteousness, and doing charity is establishing social justice. For very frequently the family in want suffers because of no fault of its own. If the bread-winner was killed, why should his widow and children be made to suffer? If disease stalks in a home, where there was little fresh air and sunlight, the community en masse may be responsible. Charity is righteousness. And the Zedakah box was a box of righteousness.

During Yom Kippur the synagogues were thronged and the multitudes of worshippers filled halls and homes to pour out their prayers to God. Thousands of Jews fasted and afflicted themselves. But is this the fast that God had chosen? With forty-five thousand Jews in Toronto why are there but 1,200 members of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies? The Jews of Toronto are being tested in the approaching drive for funds. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars are urgently needed to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. Yom Kippur will end in Toronto when this sum will be attained. This sum can be attained if all do their share, if the rich give according to their means, if the middle-class and workers all do their bit. There are so many that have luxuries, that it would be an outrage if the few hundred dependent families in our midst be denied the necessities. "Give while you live" is the slogan of the campaign. To this we add: Give that others may live.

Judaism is being tested in the Federation campaign. Our Catholic neighbours raised twice as much for their institutions this year as last year. Their drive for their needy went over the top before the campaign was scheduled to end. The Catholics have learned the lesson of charity from the book of the Jew. Has the Jew forgotten his book?

Do not wait to be asked to give! Send in your contributions. Do not see how little you can give! See how much you can give! Our faith commands, "Love thy neighbour as thyself." As we love our neighbour and help him, we save our own souls from selfishness and we prove to the world that our beautiful Yom Kippur prayers and the messages of our prophets are not mere glib rhetoric, but are indeed the words of the living God.

COMMENTARIES

By Rabbi Harry J. Stern, of Montreal
Associate Contributing Editor

MONTREAL'S "GOOD PROVIDER"

All will agree that Sir Mortimer B. Davis has become Montreal's Good Provider. Whatever Jewish institution is in need it can always turn to Sir Mortimer and receive generous support. Sir Mortimer came on a little visit to Montreal and learned of the financial distress of the organized Talmud Torahs. Five thousand dollars was his immediate reply—and a promise for a contribution in the future. This is indeed real liberality when one takes into consideration that only a short time ago the "Good Provider" gave $350,000 for a Y.M.H.A. building. We need not enumerate Sir Mortimer's annual contributions to the Federation and other institutions. These are well-known by our community leaders. However we do want to say that we are happy to count among the members identified with the Reform Congreation—"Temple Emanu-El"—Sir Mortimer B. Davis, who served as vice-president at one time and at present is an honourary trustee of the Temple.

WHY ONLY THE KOL NIDRE FORMULA?

Professor M. Kaplan of the Jewish Theological Seminary eliminated the legalistic Kol Nidre formula from the prayerbook. In place of this he substituted the 130th psalm, retaining the exquisite Kol Nidre melody. This substitution is, of course, an imitation of the form of service adopted by Liberal Jews long ago. One needs only to turn to the Union Prayerbook and convince himself of this truth. However, we do not understand why the learned professor began his reforms with the Kol Nidre which is only recited on one evening during the year. What about "Yekum Porkon"—the Aramaic prayer found in the Sabbath morning service? Certainly the Yekum Porkon —a prayer from the Exilarchs and academies of Babylon—has no meaning in the 20th century. Babylon is no longer in existence, and certainly the Jewish academies of Babylon are no more. How meaningless is such a prayer! And may we list another supplication found in the Mussaf service for the Sabbath?

> "May it be they will, O Lord our God and God of our fathers, to lead us up in joy unto our land, and to plant us within our borders, where we will prepare unto thee the sacrifices that are obligatory for us, the continual sacrifices according to their order . . . and on the Sabbath day "two he-lambs" of the first year without blemish . . ."

Certainly no Zionist ever hopes to offer "Korbonoth" in the Temple of Jerusalem in this day. Such a prayer stirs no spiritual emotion in the heart of the 20th-century Jew. However we are happy to note that Liberal Judaism marches on. We are looking forward to other courageous souls within the Orthodox wing to emancipate Judaism from the shackles of an outworn ritual. With a leading Liberal Jew we say: "Time and the American spirit are fighting on the side of Liberal Judaism."

TO [illegible] UNIVERSITY, [illegible] DAMAGE

The earthquake which shook Palestine on July 11 and caused heavy damage and loss of life all over the country, has also had serious effects on the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. In addition to damages caused to the building of the Institute of Jewish Studies, heavy losses were incurred at the Institute of Chemistry through the destruction of many instruments, etc. The exact extent of the damage has not yet been ascertained. Activities at the university are continuing as usual.

DEATH OF BEHOR EFFENDI ESKENAZY

The death occurred recently at Constantinople of Behor Effendi Eskenazy, at the advanced age of 86. The deceased was for many years president of the Jewish community and held many important positions in the State. He began his political career as a clerk in the postoffice, but he soon advanced from one post to another, until he became secretary of the Council of State and a member of that body, a post which he retained for many years. After the Constitution of the State was adopted, he was made permanent Senator, and when this body was abolished he was awarded a life pension by the Angora Government. Mr. Eskenazy was regarded as a profound scholar in Jewish matters and his opinions were often sought by the Constantinople Rabbinate.

Mortimer H. Schiff and Otto H. Kahn of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., New York, are among the American bankers who have been awarded decorations by the Emperor of Japan.

Mr. Schiff was awarded the second class order of the Sacred Treasure and Mr. Kahn, Third Class Order of the Rising Sun.

Shaare Zion Congregation,
Sherbrooke Street.
Rabbi Julius Berger

The children of Shaare Zion Institute were entertained in the Sukkah, Sunday, October 16. The programme was carried out by the children. The rabbi welcomed them in the name of the congregation and explained the lessons Sukkoth means to teach children of Israel. Refreshments were served in the Sukkah. Mesdames J. Finestone and J. Cohen were conveners, assisted by Mesdames A. S. Radovsky, K. Fisher and B. Wener. Among the guests were Rabbi and Mrs. Berger, D. Cummings and J. Feinbrook. Programme: Elyse Wyndham, piano solo; Clarise Solomons, recitation; and Ida Cohen, piano selection. In addition to the Girl Guide and Boy Scout, the Wolfe Cub was organized by Miss Levinson, Sunday, October 16. Meetings every Monday evening at the synagogue. Boys of the school, or living in the synagogue vicinity, wishing to join the Cubs may give their names to any of the teachers of the religious school. A large number of boys and girls registered Sunday, October 16, for courses offered in the daily school of Shaare Zion. A number of boys past the bar-mitzvah age requested that a class be opened for their education. Classes three times a week, including Sunday morning. Mr. Chodosh will be headmaster. Information regarding any courses for juniors, seniors and adults may be had at the synagogue office.

Stingy Becker

A Rich Man Learns that He is a Pauper in the Art of Living

By Eve Saturen

(By arrangement with the American Hebrew. Copyright. Reprint rights reserved).

"Becker's Shirts." On huge advertising walls that flanked the railroads all through the east, radiant young men, very obviously college-bred, wore them with happy smiles. On smaller placards at every stop in the subway, or in bunched, palpitating lights on Broadway, Becker's Shirts announced their supremacy to the world.

Joe Becker was proud of his success, achieved after long years of turmoil and worry—trying years he seldom managed to forget completely.

When he was eighteen he had gone to work in a basement-factory, putting sleeves in cheap shirts from six in the morning to seven at night. Machines were paddled by foot then, but Joe was young. The keener the pain became as it whipped across his stooping shoulders, the more fervently did he promise himself a future full of sunlight and happiness. He knew enough about the world not to rely just on the backwash of emotions. Joe Becker became a schemer.

One year and another went by. He knew the hollow sensations of being half-fed. The rich odour of a roast or pastry as he passed a restaurant, would make his eyes tear. He walked faster, faster to his tenement room. He denied himself every pleasure. He ignored the slightest extravagance that his heart yearned for. Joe Becker was blunt and ugly to every woman he encountered. When they turned their backs upon him and his insults, a great sigh rose within him but never escaped beyond his compressed lips.

Meanwhile another page and another of his bank books flourished a narrow tower of figures. For ten years such rigid parsimony gnawed at the flowering years of his life, leaving him a tall, gaunt person whose pallor was accentuated by bulging, burning eyes.

At thirty Joe Becker's big opportunity came. He had enough money to become a junior partner in a small shirt factory.

Marcus and Becker. A new life. It took Joe a long time to grow accustomed to being boss, to the noon hour no longer meaning a gulping half-hour for lunch. But despite every effort he could not rid himself of the old stinginess that he had forced upon himself in those long years of saving. He haggled over the price of everything without wanting to, and behind his back all who knew him called him "stingy Becker."

"Why he won't even buy himself a full meal," revealed one acquaintance knowingly . . . a man who knew nothing of how Joe Becker had starved himself until now a table laden with food gave him a sick, dizzy sensation. The neat custom-tailored suits Becker wore, the stickpin that twinkled in his tie, were things Marcus, his partner, had insisted upon. "A boss can't look like a beggar, you know," he said to Joe.

One night Joe was invited to have dinner with Marcus and his wife, Zelda, at their apartment.

"Let us invite Molly Fein ton," Marcus [illegible]

Joe Becker felt charmed.

An hour past midnight he escorted Molly Fein home. As they stepped out into the street a full moon beat down and washed the pavements with silver light.

"It's late, but let's walk," said Molly.

Joe liked the way she struck out with independent whims, and was unusually happy as they went in and out of streets. They finished one block and commenced another, talking of charming or eerie things . . . their grotesque shadows, for instance, that stalked along with them, sometimes a leg, an arm and occasionally even the head chopped off from view. They peered into the dark hallways that lined the poorer streets and Molly told Joe about the grim poverty that she, a social worker, often found behind those doors. Joe said nothing about his own dismal past but felt that she was a woman who would understand. He thought of the lovely women he had driven away during those lonely years. He drew a little closer to Molly Fein and timidly put his arm through hers as they walked along.

The following months were filled with enthusiasm and warmth for Joe. He bought expensive theatre tickets, he insisted on dining in places where the prices were most high. He hailed taxis right and left. Joe Becker's joy was twofold. At last he was free of his slavish stinginess. Sometimes, just to test himself, he was doubly extravagant. The strange, frightened look that he often detected in Molly's eyes was forgotten in the swirl of his gaiety. Joe Becker had broken free and found it glorious to be able to enjoy himself unhampered by those ten years of stinting.

Joe Becker seemed reborn. He [illegible] with Molly [illegible]

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION IN PALESTINE

The new immigration law which entered into effect on August 25, has caused considerable opposition among Palestine Jews and among the Haluzim organizations outside of Palestine. It is said that this new law exceeds in severity the American quota system. During the period of unemployment only wives and minor children of persons settled in Palestine and immigrants who, in the opinion of the authorities, are possessed of fully sufficient means will be allowed to enter the country. The immigration of Haluzim and the old test of means, the possession of 500 pounds sterling, have been suspended. It is said that this new regulation will be abolished as soon as normal conditions again prevail in the land. Russian Zionists, it is believed, will be permitted to enter without any restriction, because of their persecution by the Soviet authorities.

At the conference of the Hehaluz, the world organization of Haluzim, which was held recently at Danzig, a resolution of protest was adopted against the present action of the Palestine Government. A resolution was also adopted calling for the establishment of a seminary for training Haluzim teachers in Warsaw, and another resolution proposes to send a number of Haluzim to several west European countries, where they might obtain technical training.

Business is better than it has been in years and the Catholic charities stopped their campaign for $100,000 two days before time because they were getting too much money. The Jewish community of Toronto has a quota of $125,000 to raise next week for Federation. Federation is hard up. It needs money with which to lighten the zoras of the poor. Federation is yours, the money is yours, the poor are yours, the obligation is yours, those soliciting funds are your friends. These friends are giving their time, energy and enthusiasm besides their money. They will call on you in your office, factory, store or home. They are not book-agents, they are glorified salesmen who have nothing to gain personally. Greet these friends courteously and be ready with a cordial response. Don't reply to their request with a boorish "no" or ask them to come back to-morrow. To-day's the day any day they call. Be nice and give them lots of money!

At the social workers' convention in Toronto three years ago the feeling was general that, with Jewish immigration to this country cut down, a time would come when social workers would be out of jobs. It was thought that the problem of the Jewish poor would become so small that the work of charity-dispensing organizations would be negligible. Dr. I. M. Rubinow, of Philadelphia, an authority on the subject, regards the matter differently and tells why in an article, "The Future of Local Charities," in a recent number of the Menorah Journal. He stresses the point that the need for relief work is independent of immigration. This column gives the gist of Dr. Rubinow's article, using some material verbatim:

The year preceding the War 135,000 Jewish immigrants entered the United States; the year of 1926 less than 10,000. With the inauguration of the national origins policy, July 1, 1927, the annual quota will be reduced to the vanishing point—permanently, it seems. With the inception of the Johnson Immigration Act the Jewish American community entered a new phase. It is no longer to be concerned with the influx of thousands of immigrants, sheltering homes and the many bureaus and agencies devoted to the service of these immigrants. As a result there have been many sighs of satisfaction in the expectation of community respite from the pressure of the care of the immigrant. In the minds of board members, budget committees and contributors, home relief has been identified with the relief of the immigrant Jew. If he stops coming should not local relief cease? Instead of the answer being "yes," workers in social organizations are actually expecting a growing demand on their services and are forced to ask for increased budgets for increased responsibilities. Why? Because the need for relief work is independent of immigration and must continue even though never another Jew comes to this country!

In the twenty-five years between 1899 and 1923 there came to the United States 1,788,000 Jews. In 1897 there were less than 1,000,000 Jews in America. The present estimate is 4,000,000. This means an increase of 3,000,000 in three decades. Of these, 1,500,000 are immigrants, and the children of immigrants total another 1,000,000. This leaves about 500,000, or one in six, as a maximum of "native-born of native parentage." So, though it is true that most of the clients of Jewish social agencies to-day are in the immigrant group this is simply because six-sevenths of the Jewish community are immigrants.

It is interesting to note that all available data indicate that the more recent immigrants do not figure materially among clients of relief agencies. The very act of immigration is selective, presuming a certain standard of health, initiative and energy, and eliminating the sick, the feebleminded, the criminal and the persistent pauper. The recent immigrant group seems comparatively free from disease and other curses which the American industrial milieu has visited on immigrants of the '90s, but not because it is a superior group. The same industrial civilization may produce the same effects on the recent arrivals and then they will succeed the present clients for relief within the next twenty years.

Anyway, the need for modern scientific social case work grows even though there has been some increase in real wages; even though the declining birth-rate has reduced the need for relief; even though the family income has been increased by the admission of women to commercial and industrial pursuits. For the problem of Jewish poverty is part of the general problem of American poverty. The Jew does not rise above the level of the average wage-earner, and no matter how great his commercial talent is the shrewd Yankee and others are able competitors. The small local Jewish shopkeeper is as well known to relief agencies as is the unskilled laborer. The people who come for relief are in need not because they are immigrants, but because they are human beings and poor or workers, or both. In every country where the factory system prevails misery and want are the concomitants of the economic, psychological and social handicaps which the industrial metropolis places on its manual workers. Making up the total of unhappiness and want which the social agency attempts to remedy are conditions which are here regardless of immigration and national or racial characters. Sickness, invalidism, indigent old age, accidents, unemployment, widowhood, desertion and separation, inadequate income and excessively large families, delinquency and crime, insanity, neuroses, psychoses, feeblemindedness, sex difficulties, domestic conflicts, conflicts between generations.

In the face of a practically static poverty problem or slow improvement American Jewry must not lose its sense of social responsibility. The problem will not solve itself. It can not be met by a community whose successful business men express an impatience with the "unnecessarily expensive" overhead of an efficient social service, and who do not understand the needs of the masses and how the social agency is trying to satisfy these needs. The problem can be met only by an increase in the labor of social relief.

Under the circumstances he was happy to visit Bruce Coulter and meet his sister. Bruce Coulter was the most gifted designer of the De Luxe Jewelry Company. He could spend a morning in the Greek Rooms or the Egyptian Rooms at the Metropolitan Museum and return to the office with workable simplifications of classic designs. By his skill in adaptation a gaudy little vaudeville singer was enabled to wear a necklet of brass that had laid in gold about a tawny Macedonian throat.

Bruce Coulter was tall and pale, with a blonde sweep of hair and blue eyes that dreamed. His sister Mona was tall, pale with a blonde sweep of hair and blue eyes that dreamed. When Robert Sparkes visited the Coulters for the first time he noted the striking resemblance between brother and sister. Only the features that were in Bruce a trifle ineffectual and weak, were in Mona lovely and appealing. She moved through the solid platitudes of her home in Washington Heights like a liquid nymph. Her long, wan hair arranged high on her head, her soft fashionless dresses, her slender and delicately tinted face hardly prepared Robert Sparkes for the news that she was a stenographer in a bank. Behind the flash of his glasses his keen Jewish eyes comprehended the story of the family; the refined little mother, the clerical, commonplace father, the two frail children—Bruce with a talent that was a drag and a luxury, Mona with a distinguished beauty completely wasted on a stereotyped modernity of Washington Heights. A few of Bruce's drawings lending grace to the living room, a line of flesh-coloured stockings strung across the kitchen, and the hideous green glass dome hanging in the dining room completed the quiet little tragedy for Robert Sparkes. And he looked at Mona, sad and exquisite blossom on a scrawny tree, with pity—with pity about to turn into something else.

A few weeks later when he called up and made a date with Mona there was a stirring under the green glass dome. "He is quiet and kind, Mona"—this from her mother. "He is very brilliant—and rich"—this from her brother. "Show him a little pep, Mona—you have such dead ideas"—this from her father with the curved, desk-ridden shoulders and the colourless eyes that lighted only at a line of legs in a "show." "Please pass the butter—and show him a little pep."

For Mona this was the date of dates. She put on her cloudy gray dress much too soon and had to pile up her long, pale hair many times before it satisfied her. The weather was cool, but cool with the soft, spring touch in it. She shivered a little as she rode through the park with Robert Sparkes—her only evening wrap was frail and lavender like the after-rain. Robert Sparkes shut all the windows of his car. She sat there—slight, expectant, with stars in the blue water of her eyes.

He had never taken out anyone who moved in such an enchantment of appreciation. Beside the high windows and the ponderous drapes of the Biltmore she sat poised like a gray bird awaiting a flight into joy. She looked best, Robert Sparkes decided, when she ate bright-coloured salad leaves or the strawberry cocktail and the little leaf cakes. She was as far away from his world and as delicately dreamy as the music that floated over their meal. At the theatre she grew tense with emotion; she was moved to innocent tears, not to criticism. After the theatre the evening might have flowed along in the same stream of idyllic enjoyment if it had not been for the gypsy place.

The gypsy place was a rackety slum night club in the Hungarian part of the upper East Side. After midnight the music was very persuasive and the people—if too many actresses did not seep in—genuinely atmospheric. Robert Sparkes had gently suggested it because he felt that the evening so far had been a little sedate for so young a girl. The Persian lamb chauffeur accordingly drove them to the gypsy place and they entered its dark and dirty doors and gave up their wraps to a dark and dirty coat check girl shortly after midnight—just as a whole large Hungarian family, graduated in size like a series of little wooden dolls that fit inside each other, was leaving. Violin music ruffled by tambourines cut through the heat of the place. The smoke was so thick that Mona felt as if she were being led through a fire. She seated herself at one of the red-checked tables and consulted a menu of pancakes, pastes, jellies and mashed fishes with foreign names. She chose pancakes—the only dish with which she was familiar prodded her hair with her fingers, and looked about her at the crude mural designs of gypsies dancing on the green, of a gypsy fiddling to his beloved, of a gypsy campfire with the lovers stealing away from it, of a gypsy tryst under a try. Every now and then the orchestra crashed itself quiet, and a man would rise at one of the tables and give a melancholy violin solo. Then with the renewal of the orchestra, couples rose for dancing in the small, cleared space. Robert Sparkes danced with Mona; his dancing was a dignified walk in time to music. The other couples were more sensually attuned. The women had firm hips and spreading bosoms; the men were heavy-lipped and swarthy. At the close of the dance Mona returned to the table with pointed lights in her usually slumberous eyes. The music, the warmth and the crowd were working their charm.

The pan-cakes and the apricot jam had arrived; Robert Sparkes ordered small glasses and unscrewed a flat, silver vessel out of which he poured a rich, russet liquid. He felt that a little sherry would fit the heavy, foreign gaiety of the place. Mona sipped it unquestionably; it tasted exactly like the music—warm and soft and sweet. She drank it quickly as if she were drinking in the tune that floated over the room. Robert Sparkes filled her glass immediately; he was a little surprised at the ease with which she had disposed of the first. Was it possible that this quiet, shy little Christian had a taste for liquor? Mona, with fevered spots on her cheeks, looked at the second glass. Her father had told her to show a little pep, and this sweet, warm drink had made her feel so strangely alive and melting. She took up the second glass and drained it. Her face burned deliciously; she panted with the music, even sang the weird, wild strain. The people seemed to dance themselves into a blur; only a man at a nearby table remained clear in her vision. He had riotous, curling hair and cruel, sparkling black eyes. His mouth curved richly and beautifully. He leaned forward and looked straight into Mona's eyes. His look embranced her; she never stirred in her chair; she could never look at Robert Sparkes like that—those cold, flashing glasses kept out her glances.

Robert Sparkes' precise mouth set itself into an almost geometric line; his glasses flashed metallically; he would find out what sort this blonde angel was. In his surprise and disappointment a mean, old-maid sourness rose in him. He poured out a third glass of sherry. Mona drank it pleasurably; she tossed out untidy tendrils of her light hair as she set down the empty glass. Warmth flowed through her; her lips parted. She clutched Robert Sparkes' arm. The crown was now dancing Hungarian fashion—the men with their hands on the women's waists, the women with their hands on the men's shoulders. They danced far apart, but there was something incredibly sensual about them as they worked themselves up to a frenzy with the slow beat of the music. A sultry blonde girl tried to do the Charleston to the peculiar time and gave up in despair.

"Oh come!" said Mona, "See how they're dancing, "I'd love to dance that way."

Robert Sparkes shook his head slowly, gravely. A light leaped into the snake eyes of the man at the nearby table. He beckoned Mona into the rising tide.

"You might have another drink before you go," suggested Robert Sparkes sarcastically. And Mona took him literally and sipped from a fourth glass.

She danced Hungarian fashion, too. It was very easy—just stamping in time to the music. Her partner looked straight into her eyes all the time; she was very conscious of his hands on her waist. They caressed her. She wanted to cry with happiness; she had never felt so warm and alive and expansive. But even that long-drawn, tearing tune had to stop and she sagged into her seat next to Robert Sparkes. She stretched her legs far apart and put her hands to her head. The smoke gathered very thick about her. Through the heat and the languor she heard Robert Sparkes' voice. "Some black coffee to sober her up!" And when it came she drank it obediently. The smoke cleared a little; the gypsies on the wall no longer looked fantastic, but crude. The curly-headed man with whom she had danced really had a horrible face. Sparkes' glasses shone silver and hard. Mona felt as if she had returned from beauty into life.

"Let's go," she said wearily and smoothed the wayward strands of her hair.

The ride to Washington Heights was cool climatically and temperamentally. Mona began seriously to consider whether or not she had been drunk. Well, if she had been she could realize now why people drank. She wished Robert Sparkes did not sit there so silently, so stiffly. She had learned about life tonight, but he apparently did not wish to share it. Standing before the doorway of her home she thanked him as eloquently as her weariness and the reaction of excitement permitted. She was looking pale and frail again, and her eyes dreamed without stars once more.

Robert Sparkes was never so lonely as when he rode down to Gramercy Park that cool, spring morning. Truly he had been expecting too much of life. Perhaps Selma Brinkner with her serious social service ideas really was the girl for him. But he wished he had never thought of the sherry. And he certainly would never enter that Hungarian hole again.

Dr. Krass to Open Federation Campaign

Dr. Nathan Krass of Temple Emanuel of New York City will be the guest of honour and speaker at the dinner in the Crystal Ball Room of the King Edward Hotel Sunday at 6.30 p.m., to open the drive of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies for $125,000 which will last from October 23 to October 27. Born at Odessa, Russia, August 1, 1879, Dr. Krass came to the United States from Russia. He received the degree B.L. from the University of Cincinnati, and later B.H.L. from the Hebrew Union College in 1900. In 1903, he became rabbi. He took some post-graduate work at Harvard and the University of Chicago and later he was made doctor of literature by Owensboro College of Kentucky. June 21, 1906, he married Eda Keller, of Cleveland. Previous to his present position of rabbi of the Temple Emanuel of New York City, Dr. Krass held pastorates in Donaldaville, Muncie, Owensboro, Lafayette, Rochester, Temple Israel, Brooklyn, and the Central Synagogue of New York City. Professor of homiletics of the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York City, he also lectured for the Pond Lyceum Bureau at Chautauqua, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and before various colleges and societies on religion and educational themes. Dr. Krass was chairman of the educational board of the Hebrew Educational Society of Brooklyn, and headed the Juvenile Probation Association; also he founded and led the Brownsville Forum. During the war, Dr. Krass toured the United States in behalf of the sale of Liberty bonds. His travels have taken him through France, Austria, Roumania, Bessarabia, Bukovina, Poland and Russia, where he studied the pogrom and food problems for the Joint Distribution Committee. Workers in the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies drive for $125,000 from October 24 to 27 will meet at a breakfast at 9.15 a.m., Monday, at the Primrose Club. Norman Summerville will be the main speaker. Luncheon Tuesday, October 25, and Thursday, October 27, at the Primrose Club. Speakers. Reports.

UNCIRCUMCISED JEWISH CHILDREN ARE JEWS

The Warsaw Tribunal recently rendered a decision compelling the rabbinical authorities to register as Jews Jewish children who have not entered the Abrahamic Covenant. A test case was made by a Jewish Bundist leader, Councillor Alter, who declined to have his son circumcised, but insisted that he be entered in the registry of Jewish names as a Jew. The rabbis refused to do so and the case was taken to the courts. Even now the rabbinical authorities are reluctant to abide by the decision and are threatened with legal proceedings.

COLLECTS $50 FOR NATIONAL FUND

B. Lastar returned from Europe by the S.S. Berengaria last week. On the eve of the Day of Atonement, Mr. Lastar arranged that the Jews on board be asked to come to one section of the boat to get a sufficient number of men to create a Minyan. Seventeen women and children who spoke only Yiddish could thus converse with the other Jews on board. Mr. Lastar delivered a sermon, and spoke on Kol Nidre and the meaning of Yom Kippur. A sermon was delivered the following day to 110 Jewish men, women and children. When the people insisted upon presenting Mr. Lastar with money he accepted $50 for the Jewish National Fund to be transmitted through the Central Divisbo.

Fifty thousand marks was subscribed by the Jewish community of Berlin toward the Hindenburg Fund on the occasion of his eightieth birthday. The fund is to be used for the aid of disabled soldiers wounded in the world war.

The tooth is to give cheerfully proportionately and evenly unstinted nerve to put it in the toothman's hand, thereby exciting in him the pleasant sensation of shame.

WEDDINGS

Rosenfeld—Rosenthal

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. A. Rosenthal, 218 Russell Hill Road, at 6.30 o'clock, Wednesday, October 12, their daughter, Janice Leonore, became the bride of Maurice Rosenfeld, son of Mr. and Mrs. M. Rosenfeld, Rabbi Isserman officiating. Autumn flowers, roses, palms and ferns were used throughout the house. The ceremony was performed in the living-room. The bride, who was given in marriage by her father, was gowned in a period costume of white transparent velvet with pearl trimmings. The bridal veil was of tulle and Chantilly lace made in cap effect and caught to the head at the sides with clusters of orange blossoms. She carried a shower bouquet of orchids and lilies-of-the-valley. Miss Ruth Rosenthal, sister of the bride, who wore blue taffeta in period style, trimmed with silver and French flowers, was maid of honour and carried a bouquet of sweetheart roses. Miss Bobby Rosenfeld, sister of the groom, who was bridesmaid, was in coral velvet and her bouquet was of sweetheart roses. Joe Rosenfeld was best man. The wedding music was supplied by an orchestra. The bride's mother wore a gown of apple green velvet and silver with shoes and stockings to match. The groom's mother was gowned in black velvet with corsage of pink roses. Mrs. Nathan Phillips, of Cornwall, grandmother of the bride, wore a black beaded gown with corsage of red roses. Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Rosenfeld are spending their honeymoon in North Carolina, the bride travelling in a French dress of grey and grey cloth coat trimmed with grey fox, with hat, shoes and stockings to match. They will live in Toronto. The out-of-town guests were Mr. and Mrs. N. Phillips, of Cornwall, Ont.; Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Michaels, Miss Lorraine Michaels, Dr. Gordon Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. Alan J. Hart, all of Montreal; Mr. and Mrs. Shalit, Carl Lipovitch, Max Loceff, and Mr. and Mrs. Lipovitch, all of Detroit.

ENGAGEMENTS

The engagement is announced of Pearl, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. S. Greisman to Samuel Sigal, son of Mrs. Sima Sigal. Marriage latter part of November.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Rose announce the engagement of their eldest daughter, Cecilia, to Harold Breslin, son of Mr. and Mrs. S. Breslin, 46 Brunswick Avenue. Wedding to take place quietly, December 1st.

BORN

To Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Cash (nee Bertha Wexman), 259 Brock Avenue, at Toronto General Hospital, Tuesday, October 11, at 8.30 p.m., a son, Jack Wilfred; seven pounds three ounces.

APPROACHING MARRIAGES

Mrs. B. Swartz, Palmerston Avenue, announces the approaching marriage of her daughter, Doris, to Harry Marcus, in Ottawa, Sunday, October 30.

... ROYAL ALEXANDRA

Mistakes of children, their irreverences, sometimes their disregard of what seem to the parents the holy things of life, make parents pessimistic. They can gather some consolation in the prophecy that the children become parents, will have the same problems to face in their children, and then the teaching and the sturdiness of the oldest generation will speak through the life of the middle generation to the youngest.

While the play, "The Jazz Singer," in which George Jessell will appear at the Royal Alexandra for one week, beginning Monday, October 31, states some of the problem and seems to limit it to the Jewish group. The problem is larger than any particular group. It is the human problem of preserving the achievements of one generation for the next without destroying independence of thought and decision.

"Body and Soul," at Loew's, next Monday afternoon, is a sex drama. Aileen Pringle, Metro's striking beauty, is leading lady. Other stars are Norman Kerry, with his gorgeous physique and his assurance with women, and the artist, the dreamer, demented-with-jealousy-Lionel Barrymore, who is famed for his use of a whip in a celluloid harem. In this daring story the three excel. Wonderful backgrounds enhance the beauty of the scenes enacted; camera effects are stunning, lighting excellent. Splendid support is given the three stars. The picture is vital, vivid and romantic. Five vaudeville acts will also be offered, featuring "Castle of Dreams."

The seventh is still more meritorious, namely, to bestow charity in such a way that the benefactor may not know the relieved person, nor they the name of their benefactors, as was done by our charitable forefathers during the existence of the temple. For there was in that holy building a place called the Chamber of the Silent, wherein the good deposited secretly whatever their generous hearts suggested and from which the poor were maintained with equal secrecy.

NORTHERN ONTARIO CANADA

Northern Ontario, now open for settlement at fifty cents per acre, contains millions of acres of the finest agricultural land in the world. Its resources in lumber, minerals, water, power, fish, game and scenery are immense. The land calls for men to cultivate it, and in return will give health, comfort and prosperity.

What settlers say of the soil, climate, farming and forest life, is told in a most attractive booklet issued under the direction of the Honourable John S. Martin, Minister of Agriculture for Ontario. Full instructions in regards to acquiring a title to these rich agricultural lands are also given.

THE COMMUNITIES ORDINANCE IN PALESTINE

The ordinance for the governing of the Jewish communities in Palestine which went into effect recently is being strenuously opposed by the leaders of Agudas Israel. The leaders of this organization in Palestine combined with the Kenesseth Israel of Jerusalem to form a separate United Orthodox Congregation, in opposition to the Vaad Leumi, although the two organizations have been hostile to one another for some time. This action will undermine the intention of the Communi... nance, which aimed at having ... Jewish community in Palestine.

According to an Arab paper ... Lord Plumer brought with h... London a definite plan for the ... tution of a Legislative Asse... Palestine. It is added, howe... the opinion of the represent... the Arabs will be invited befo... executed. A meeting of leadi... tinian Arabs will soon be called ... up a proposal for submission ... Government.

hilarious pleasure, [illegible] the parties were costing. Her mind whirled like a windmill grinding out calculations.

After Joe Becker and Molly were married six months, he discovered that she was trying to push him back into his old way of skinting and saving. At first her commands were veiled. Then Molly began to remonstrate loudly and incessantly. "You spend money like a drunkard," she cried.

"Molly, dear," Joe replied, and he thought of that moonlight night when it occurred to him that she was the type of woman who would understand, "you don't know how eagerly, how earnestly I have been wanting to do just that!"

He whispered stories of the many starvations he had forced upon himself, and how, after he did have money, he thought he was beyond the joy of life.

"Then you came, Molly," he went on, "and my stinginess fell from me like a shroud cast off by a man who refused to be buried alive."

"All that makes no difference," Molly answered coldly, unmindful of the tremour in his voice or the film of pain these recollections brought to his eyes. "It's insane to spend money like that."

If Joe Becker bore her any resentment after that, there were no outward manifestations of it. He was kind and solicitous, for Molly was expecting a child. She never voiced any dreams, any wild ambitions for the newcomer. Joe Becker wanted a son. In the middle of the night, he would awake and mumble his great desire aloud in the still, dark room.

"I shall buy him everything!" He forgot that it would be her child also.

A son was born, Morris. His mother dressed him without frills or bows. Joe hugged the tiny infant and was convinced that his eyes, ears and nose were exactly like his own. He conceived splendid, extravagant hopes for the boy's future, but he kept them to himself. He patiently watched Morris grow from baby into a chattering youngster and commenced bringing home intriguing toys. The glad gurgles of delight that burst from the child were stilled by Molly's angry expostulations.

"Listen here, Joe," she said. "I have no respect for spendthrifts. I shall certainly see to it that my son is not pampered to boyhood, one too."

Electric trains, aside from [illegible]

Joe Becker's life, a life [illegible] laundry. All the things that Joe had wanted when he was a boy, and now wanted to buy for his own child, were like vile objects of evil to Molly.

"What is the good of all this money that I have now, when you refuse to let any of us enjoy it?" he asked.

Often, when Joe Becker and Molly walked past shop windows that displayed soft, shimmering gowns, it was he who stopped and drew her eyes toward the lovely mannequins.

"You know, Molly," Joe said, "it would be nice to see you in an expensive dress like that."

At first she laughed at such remarks and never bought that kind of dress. Then a time came when such suggestions brought a tirade of cold words from her lips — long recitations that breathed of those days when she planned economy programmes for social work organizations. "The madness of the world to-day," she cried, "lies in this orgy of spending."

She finally froze the heart of Joe Becker into silence. He looked back on that soft moonlight night when he had dined at the Marcus's, and felt tricked. But it was too late now. Of course he could go on spending for spite but he wanted the laughter, the pleasures, the gay freedom that he used to dream that money could bring.

In ironic contrast with the new poverty of his soul, Joe Becker's material wealth increased in leaps and bounds. Marcus had withdrawn from the partnership to take over a factory for himself, leaving Becker sole owner of the old business. "Becker's Shirts." The first sign was small and unpretentious, gradually growing into the great blazing one that posed over Broadway.

Morris Becker was growing too—into a tall young man of eighteen with an uncertain air, a wavering in his speech and a shifting look in his eyes. He was the son of a mother and father who, in their struggle to assert their different influences upon him, had almost pulled his own individuality asunder.

Undeniably Molly had the stronger effect upon young Becker. Under her torrid gaze, as she advised that it was his duty to know the great economic significance of money, he was helpless as if under the spell of a scheming hypnotist. Molly's zeal burned in her face like a feverish malady and Morris obeyed her implicitly. He even permitted Molly to choose his clothes. Nowhere about his person was there a touch of the dash or arrogance of youth. Once Joe brought home a box of wild-hued socks, the kind that other young men of Morris's age were wearing. The vivid, expensive hose brought a shriek of laughter from Molly, while Morris looked sadly disconcerted. He thanked his father for the gift but there was no pleasure in his eyes and Joe Becker never saw him wear the socks.

A peculiar sadness settled on Joe. He hungrily read of this person or that taking his family to Saranac to skate, ski and laugh. In the summer he listened to business associates talk of trips until he heard imaginative, warm seas booming in his ears. "If she would only let Morris be free and young, at least," mused Joe. If he would only open his eyes some day we might travel to all the strange and distant corners of the earth."

Of such things did Joe Becker dream as he sat at his wide mahogany desk. Belle Loeb, his secretary, often watched him and wondered.

"You have pleasant secrets sometimes, Joe Becker," she laughed.

There was a fine, easy spirit between Belle Loeb and her employer. Joe Becker had liked her since the first day that she had come into his office almost fifteen years ago. There was a gaiety in her eyes that he would have given half of his wealth to see in Molly's or his own. She was a capable, serious woman and although she looked no more than twenty-five, only Joe knew that she was really thirty-five—perhaps even a little older than that. Still she had the charm of youth . . . a diminutive chic figure, small white hands and slender legs. She always wore necklaces of very bright beads, slave bracelets and dangling earrings. She owned a dozen tiny hats and Joe Becker often found himself just waiting for her to enter the office, wondering what new or charming thing she would wear that day. There was a joy, a wildness about her that made him have twice as many dreams about how splendid life could be if only Molly were different.

Now Belle Loeb was an inveterate spendthrift. Becker paid her forty dollars a week, and she just "managed." She lived in a small, dingy room in Harlem, or rather, she slept there. She spent all her time where there were people and laughter. Joe Becker listened to her with envy more than anything else. She told him of concerts, of plays, of skating rinks until a sensation like pain crept into his heart.

"If only Morris would go out like that," he thought to himself.

Then one day Molly Becker became really ill. Long ago Joe had noticed a heavy yellow tinge upon her skin, but Molly scorned his advice to see a doctor. The passing months deepened the sickly colour, and Molly consulted a physician secretly. After that she spoke almost constantly to her son of many things that he must do if she were to die. Death claimed her one week later, leaving Joe and Morris bewildered.

Subtly, kindly, Joe Becker tried to get Morris to look at life differently. "The first thing," he said, "you must go off to college. You can go to West Point, anywhere, but get spirit into your blood."

"But mother wanted me to go right into your business," Morris said.

In the end he took his father's advice and Joe Becker bore himself with a new warm pride. His own son! There were rumours in commercial centres that Becker was negotiating for the lease of his factory. In a few years he planned a world tour with his son. But after two years at school, Morris packed his belongings and came back to New York. Molly's influence still clung to him. She had always looked forward to seeing him in his father's office.

Joe Becker's vivid mental expeditions vanished. Morris was in the office early each morning. Occasionally he lifted his nose from the grindstone to admire Belle Loeb. The exquisite fragrance of expensive perfume escaped from her small, fine handkerchiefs and trailed after him like gentle recollections on a spring day. The tinkle of her bracelets, the teasing impertinence of her earrings, the bubbling mirth in her eyes . . . these things charmed him and made him forget many of the things that Molly had warned him to be on his guard against with women.

Joe Becker watched the beginning of this affair with mingled feelings. He thought his first rebellious feelings due to his knowledge that Belle Loeb was what most fathers would term "too old" for their sons. But Joe Becker decided not to interfere. He liked a certain camaraderie that sprung up between his son and himself . . . a silent understanding that this was the sort of thing that Molly would never have sanctioned.

"Good Lord, Belle," warned her friends, "don't get in with the Beckers. They're tightwads!"

Then one night Morris took Belle to the B—— Ball. She had withdrawn the last of her bank account to buy a gown frail as a cobweb, scintillating as a starry night. Her small, sleek head was banded in brilliants. Morris seemed dazzled by her loveliness.

"You look like . . . like Cleopatra, Belle," he offered timidly.

Long past midnight Belle and Morris were ready to leave. Belle's face was flushed, her sleek head a little awry. Stepping out into the street, they found everything washed in moonlight just as on that night twenty-five years ago when Molly and Joe had walked home together.

"Belle," said Morris, "I want you to marry me."

The moonlight was very bright and fell on the countless, tiny spangles on her dress till nothing seemed real. The dingy little room in Harlem was far away. Belle smiled roguishly. "Do you realize what marrying me would mean, Morris?" she asked.

She trusted the moonlight and decided that this was the time to test the stories about the "stingy Beckers" . . . to test her obsession for youth and romance.

"All my life, Morris," she went on, "I have loved luxuries. You are rich and I would want to live like a gay queen who asks no questions about money." She could not pull her eyes away from the moon. Wild things that she had meant never to utter fell from her lips. "On each birthday I should expect you to bring me a rare jewel that you had explored a hundred shops for. My home . . . each room would be strangely different. One with dark, heavy silks and massive antique furniture. Another with things pale and [illegible] rooms done in [illegible] and orchid like the [illegible] summer dawn. And what [illegible] I should have!" She seemed to be [illegible] to herself breathlessly. "Supple velvets and in every shade! Then like a capricious bird, I might wake some morning and say, 'Morris, you must leave your business, everything and fly from this hateful city to the stillness of mountains and woods with me.' Or it might be the sea that would call me."

"That's just wild talk," said Morris. His hand had fallen away from her elbow. His voice was husky and Belle had never seen a man look so pale. Deep in his heart he knew that Belle Loeb would squander money. A sort of fear sprang into his eyes—not the fear of a man but that of a child who has often been whipped and is bewildered by his own disobedience.

"Why it's insane to spend money foolishly," exclaimed Morris . . . the very words with which Molly had answered her husband so many years ago.

"Of course it is, Morris," agreed Belle, and she fell to laughing, one merry peal after another filling the air. She caught a glimpse of Morris's face. No pain, no shame . . . only a sweep of relief to see that she was taking it all as a huge joke. They were before her door in Harlem.

"Forgive me for laughing, Morris," said Belle, "but I suddenly saw what a joke it was for a woman past thirty-five to go romancing."

At the office there was a chilly distance between the two after that night. Joe Becker managed to wheedle the story out of Morris. And instead of regrets he felt a soft elation to know that Belle Loeb would go on coming in each morning bringing radiant cheer with her, and for the first time in all the years that they had worked side by side, Joe asked Belle to dine with him, to go to the theatre afterwards.

All evening his heart pounded furiously. He thought it due to his entry into the world of theatres and restaurants once again, but it was the subconscious realization that he was free . . . free to make something joyful of his life yet.

He watched Belle's youthful face, he listened to her vivacious talk and was afraid of his fifty-five years and the hope that stirred in his heart. He now knew why he had felt so much like fighting when Morris had commenced taking Belle out. He leaned forward and took Belle's hand in his. "Did you care for that sort of wine, Belle?" he asked softly.

[illegible] that h[illegible] question [illegible] of the [illegible] very close [illegible] the nar[illegible] of strange lands.

"Belle," he said, "am I too old, my dear, to ask you to share your youth and life with mine?"

And Belle knew that she would say "yes," for in fifteen years Joe had taken a definite place in her life. Still, a wild impulse seized her.

"If I married you, Joe Becker," she said, "I should buy jewels, velvet dresses of . . ."

But Joe knew of all the things she had said to Morris. "My dear," he interrupted, "nothing would make me happier."

If Morris had any objections to his father's second marriage, he forgot them in his excitement and joy when Joe Becker told him that he was to have complete control of the factory for a long time—perhaps for always. In three months Joe Becker and his bride were to sail for a trip around the world.

The morning that the "Bellgenaria" crept out of New York harbour, Joe Becker told Belle that his life had been like a coma. Only now was he awake and happy. He put his arm through Belle's and together they waved to Morris until he was no longer in sight. A bright sun fell across the towering, receding buildings as the boat pulled out, and on top of one "BECKER'S SHIRTS," a sign of huge letters, smiled bon voyage to this man who had struggled and achieved much.

JUBILEE OF POLITICAL ANTI-SEMITISM

Austrian anti-Semites are preparing to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of a definite anti-Semitic party in Austria, under the aegis of the Christian Socialist Party, in 1877. The first programme of the new party was formulated during the elections to the Austrian Parliament four years later. Similar organizations have subsequently been formed in several of the other countries of Central Europe, all of which aiming at influencing legislation in favor of their platform. The anti-Semitic press in Austria is endeavoring to use this opportunity as a means of propaganda for their doctrines and the leaders are preparing to arrange for a series of demonstrations and meetings in commemoration of the event. Regret is expressed that while the movement found many supporters in Eastern Europe, it did not succeed in establishing itself permanently in Western countries, such as England, France, Italy and the United States.

The gift of 5,800 rubles toward the fund to aid the sufferers of the Crimean earthquake, advanced by the Agrofon elicited much praise on the part of the Crimean press, especially in view that the money was to be distributed equally among the population irrespective of race or nationality.
